The data indicate that we have developed a protein array technology which is able to produce protein signatures that can be used to define homologous proteins of individual species. However, direct detection of the proteins without antibody-targeted capture is also possible, and we demonstrate its potential by a successful detection of a single type of protein from a complex protein mixture. As a step toward clinical application, we have tested the use of this microarray system for cancer diagnostics. We chose a metastatic ovarian tumor with known protein profiles and compared the protein patterns from tissue with that of ascites, in an attempt to find a protein marker for the identification of ascites fluid. We were able to successfully identify serous ascites, which is often associated with primary ovarian tumors, by detecting its unique protein signature. Since the platform we use is very similar to what will be used for clinical applications, we also evaluated the effect of the microarray unit on the morphology of specimens. The specimens on the unit are as thick as normal pieces of liver tissue. Sections of such samples do not form a complete monolayer, but displace water at the interface, which is transparent and so do not affect the staining. We found that the morphology of tissue is not affected and that the microarray technique will be suitable for diagnosis of non-tissue specimens. We have shown that our protein array platform is valuable for profiling protein expression of tissues and cells, but also that it can be used for rapid analysis of complex protein mixtures in biological fluids. Thus the major advantage of the microarray is its potential to monitor multiple protein analytes simultaneously. The real challenge is how to integrate the technology with existing analytical instruments for high throughput analysis. Abbreviations ===== MALDI: matrix-assisted
